Hartcher identifies six key areas that need to be addressed in order to solve Africa's problems:

- Governance: Africa needs to improve its governance in order to create a more stable and prosperous environment for its citizens.
- Education: Africa needs to invest in education in order to create a more skilled workforce and to improve the lives of its people.

- Health care: Africa needs to improve its health care system in order to reduce the number of deaths from preventable diseases.
- Infrastructure: Africa needs to invest in infrastructure in order to connect its people and businesses to the global economy.
- Agriculture: Africa needs to invest in agriculture in order to increase its food production and to reduce its dependence on imported food.
- Trade: Africa needs to increase its trade with other countries in order to boost its economy.

Hartcher argues that these six areas are interconnected, and that progress in one area will lead to progress in other areas. For example, improved governance will lead to increased investment in education, which will lead to a more skilled workforce, which will lead to increased economic growth. Similarly, improved health care will lead to a healthier population, which will lead to increased productivity, which will lead to increased economic growth.

Hartcher's book provides a comprehensive and well-argued analysis of the challenges facing Africa. He offers a number of practical solutions to these challenges, and he is optimistic about the future of the continent. He believes that Africa has the potential to become a prosperous and peaceful continent, and he argues that the world has a responsibility to help Africa achieve its potential.
